THE STORY

'Office Christmas Party' is the story of how a company called Zenotek hatched the most significant advance in internet technology of the new millennium. Josh Parker (Jason Bateman), Chief Technical Officer of Zenotek's Chicago branch, meets with his lawyer to finalize his divorce in time for the holidays. Zenotek meanwhile has failed to meet its quarterly quota, and intermediate CEO Carol Vanstone (Jennifer Aniston) threatens to lay off 40% of the staff, cut bonuses, and cancel the annual Christmas party. Her brother, and branch manager ClayVanstone (T. J. Miller), is desperate to keep his staff.

Josh Parker's head of tech, Tracey (Olivia Munn) propose partnering with financial giant Walter Davis (Courtney B. Vance) who is pleased with the pitch, but concerned with another recent branch closure at Zenotek, feeling that the company is more about the budget than their people. Clay Vanstone invites him to their Christmas party in hopes of showing him that their company is in good standing...

OUR REVIEW

The movie is dealing with not enough plot. Nobody cares what the people at Zenotek do for a living. Even if their jobs wind up revolutionizing the way human beings use the internet, every second spent trying to justify the company's existence doesn't make this the funniest 'Office Christmas Party' it can possibly be. Once word gets out to the city at large that a party's underway, random Chicagoans start to crash the event...They seem to understand the situation better: If tomorrow's uncertain, why not burn the place to the ground?

The kernel of inspiration behind this whole out-of-control rager might be 'nostalgia' for less politically correct times... In the film, the party doesn't really get started until Walter receives an inadvertent snow-machine blast of cocaine straight into his nasal passages...
